Read the passage and choose appropriate answers from the options: (Q.86-90)

The condition of happiness is the life of reason. Virtue or rather excellence will depend on clear judgement, self control and symmetry of desires. It is not the possession of the simple man, nor the gift of innocent intent, but the achievement of experience in the fully developed man. Yet, there is a road to it, which may save many detours and delays. It is the middle way. The qualities of character can be arranged in the triads in each of which the first and the qualities will be vices, and the middle quality, a virtue excellence. So, between cowardice and rashness is courage, between stringiness and extravagance is liberty, between sloth and greed is ambition, between secrecy and loquacity is honesty, between quarrelsomeness and flattery is friendship.
